

PT-141

Increased Sexual Desire (Injectable)

According to a survey published in the Journal of the American Medical Association (JAMA), 31% of men experience some form of sexual dysfunction. It's estimated that erectile dysfunction alone affects nearly 20 million men in the U.S. The numbers are even worse for women with 43% seeking relief from some form of sexual disorder.

Fortunately, in recent years, sexual dysfunction has been recognized as an important public health concern. As a result, great advances have been made in the development of new drugs to combat a variety of sexual disorders. Among the most exciting of these "miracle drugs" is the peptide Bremelanotide, commonly referred to as PT-141. The "arousing" effects of this peptide were discovered, accidentally, during initial trials for the self-tanning drug Melanotan II.

In men, it has shown great promise in combatting ED. In fact, a study published by the US National Library of Medicine/National Institutes of Health concluded that "Administration of PT-141 to normal men and to patients with erectile dysfunction resulted in a rapid dose-dependent increase in erectile activity."

Studies have demonstrated that PT-141 increases sexual desire in both men and women; and shows great promise for men experiencing Erectile Dysfunction (ED).

In women, PT-141 can restore a more youthful emotion response in those who are experiencing a loss of desire for intimacy. Not only is this unique peptide effective in enhancing arousal, it also helps promote bonding with your partner. For women, there's nothing else like it on the market.

Unlike Cialis, Viagra and other phosphodiesterase inhibitors, PT-141 doesn't directly affect the vascular system. Instead, this incredible peptide targets the region of the brain that regulates sexual desire and arousal.

When used as directed PT-141 is a safe and effective option for anyone who is experiencing decreased sexual desire or diminished sexual function. In clinical trials PT-141 was also shown to be effective in reducing stress and improving mood.
